In an SOA model, service providers are the "weak links" of a service-oriented architecture. Service providers include application servers, messaging servers, and database servers. Unfortunately, conventional service provider clustering techniques are resource intensive. A clustered service provider ("cluster") must be capable of scaling to meet service demands without single points of failure. Many clusters attempt to support capacity requirements by deploying additional clustered service provider nodes. Cluster software on each additional node must be updated to include a copy of the file containing the service definition. As the number of nodes increases, the management of the cluster software becomes increasingly complex. In a standard implementation, service definition files are frequently replicated for each node. This must be accomplished in a manner that enables failover during a cluster failure. Replicating the entire service definition file to each node within a cluster is typically not an option. For example, some service definition files exceed the maximum file size allowed by a given clustered service provider (e.g., is.syntax=".proto2"). Attempting to replicate such a large file to each node in a clustered service provider is time consuming and inefficient. There is therefore a need for a method and system for efficiently providing failover of clustered service providers without depending on a complete service definition file for each node.[Methods of preparation and induction of vitiligo]. Vitiligo is the most common chronic skin condition in humans. It is characterized by loss of skin pigment, usually in the form of white spots, leaving the skin lighter.

The distribution of the lesion may be focal or generalized, depending on the stage of the disease. It affects all races in all ages, although its prevalence is higher in people of Mediterranean origin. It is a multifactorial disorder. Exposure to certain chemicals, fever and thyroid gland dysfunction are the main factors implicated in the induction of the disease. Exposure to UV light causes the disorder in susceptible subjects 04aeff104c
